I think that no matter what medium you use – from oil paintings to YouTube or Twitter or special effects photographs – it all counts for nothing, unless you have something to say; some truth to share, some feeling or frustration to express that resonates with other people I think too often we get seduced by the technology, or the graphic design, and we end up saying nothing too loudly. Please continue to submit jobs early and often! My friend, Eric Bryan, recently pointed out that I re-post a lot of articles about writing on social media, articles with tips from how to structure your writing time to overcoming self-doubt to plotting your novel, but rarely do these essays touch on perhaps the most important I Have Something to Say of the writing life: having something to say.
