But not everyone accepts the implications and the power of this reality. He then makes a three-fold claim: first, that the damned have in some sense deluded themselves, second, that they have the power to cling to their delusions forever, and third, that God cannot forcibly remove their self-imposed deceptions without interfering with their freedom in relation to him WallsCh. As these remarks illustrate, the Augustinian understanding of original sin implies that we are all born guilty of a heinous sin against God, and this inherited guilt relieves God of any responsibility for our spiritual welfare. Sadly, if a family member rejects the gospel, then he chooses to separate himself. In any case, the vast majority of Christian philosophers who have addressed the topic of hell in recent decades and have published at least some of their work in the standard philosophical journals do accept proposition 1 and also reject, therefore, any hint of Augustinian limited election. Here are four solutions people offer: Option 1: Heaven is not heaven. But here is perhaps the most important point of all. Thank you for forgiving my sins, and giving me the gift of eternal life. That is fragment states, "Chance never helps the men who do not work. The leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations.
